PREFACE

Preparation of this list was begun two years ago as a supplement to the Montana library list published in 1920. It was soon found that the number of obsolete titles in the old list and the very large number of books recently published for children made it desirable to present an entirely new library list for the elementary schools of the state.

Those who have assisted in the preparation of the list have given much time to the examination of available books and have also made constant use of several of the best book lists prepared for children in the elementary grades: Books for the Elementary School Library, which is Maryland School Bulletin Vol. VIII, Number 2; Children's Reading by Terman and Lima, published by D. Appleton, New York, 1926; The Winnetka Graded Book List by Washburne and Vogel, published by the American Library Association, 1926, and also by Rand, McNally under the title What Children Like to Read, 1926; Graded List of Books for Children, prepared by the School Library Committee of the National Education Association and published by the American Library Association.

Most of the titles used are to be found in one or more of the above lists. Several books listed have been published since the above lists were compiled. A positive effort has been made to omit the titles of harmful and worthless books. It has not been possible to exercise much judgment in the evaluation of editions, owing to the fact that the compilers did not have access to all of the books.

It has been the aim to present for the kindergarten and lower grades the most delightful picture books, fairy stories, myths, rhymes, and jingles. For children who are outgrowing the fairy world, the list includes nature and animal stories, child life in other lands, and books of travel which furnish excellent foundation material for the study of geography. For the period when hero worship is developing, books of legends and simple narratives of the lives of heroes and famous men and women are listed, followed by books on mechanics, inventions, exploration and adventure, as well as by stories of home and school life, nature stories, biography, history, science, travel, poetry, and fiction.

The list presented is not exhaustive. It merely presents about 1220 titles which have seemed worthy of recognition in a recommended list for the elementary schools. There has been a conscious effort not to place the grade recommendation of a book too low. In many instances the findings of the Winnetka study relative to the median reading grade at which children most enjoy a book have been accepted. Owing to the well-known fact that the range of children's reading abilities varies too widely for positive grade placement of books, the grade recommendations are only suggestive of the approximate place in the elementary school where the book might be of interest.

The work of compiling the list was performed in large part by Misses Rose K. Brandt and Luella M. King, former state rural school supervisors, and by Miss Martha Birkeland, present state rural school supervisor. Many publishers have greatly assisted by submitting sample copies of books for examination.

MAY TRUMPER,
Superintendent of Public Instruction.

FOREWORD TO THE TEACHER

The importance of careful guidance of children's reading cannot be overestimated. There is serious danger that teachers, in their efforts to have children learn how to read, may overlook the importance of having them learn what to read. There probably has never been a time when the long lists of titles of books for children were more bewildering than now, not only to children, but to parents and teachers as well. The fact that books for children are abundant would not be disturbing were it not for the added fact that many of them are harmful, and still more are worthless. It requires close scrutiny and careful judgment on the part of adults today to insure placing before children the really fine types of literature available.

That reading material selected has a distinct bearing upon the child's progress in school is evidenced by the ease with which he accomplishes his work in such subjects as history or geography if his reading outside of school has been abundant and well selected; that it has a bearing upon his habits of thought is evidenced by the alertness and general understanding of the child who has been taught to enjoy good literature.

The teacher's first problem is to help the child to master the mechanics of reading. No one can read with enjoyment unless he can read easily. This ability to read easily can be secured only by reading a great deal. Exercise and practice secure skill in reading just as they do in typing or driving a car or riding a bicycle.

But skill in reading can not be secured with too difficult material. Experiments have demonstrated that many children, by reason of the fact that they are constantly being compelled to read material too difficult for them, form wrong habits in the use of the eye muscles and consequently never enjoy reading. Children in the fourth grade with second-grade reading ability are easy to discover. It is not so easy to adjust their problem. Unless easy reading material is being constantly placed before them to supplement their regular class work such children are acquiring a distaste for reading which will probably remain with them for life. Children select for themselves easy reading. By always reading what is not too difficult for them they learn to read with enjoyment. Great care should be taken to assist children to find books suited to their reading abilities.

The earlier this mechanical skill in reading is mastered, the sooner the child may devote himself to reading for enjoyment. It is when he is ready to read for enjoyment as well as while he is developing his skill that the greatest care should be exercised in providing him with good books. A taste for particular kinds of books is often formed by the time a child is eight or nine years old. Once formed, it is difficult to alter. A variety in kinds of books should be provided, but the child's choice should be made from collections free from the inane and worthless juveniles so abundant in most book shops.

It has become more and more apparent in recent years that in order to have children's reading interests develop normally, the school has an important work to perform not only in insuring to all children an opportunity to have access to good books, but also in giving encouragement to good reading through the discussion of books and the suggestion of supplementary reading in connection with the work of the school. The importance of this responsibility of the school is evident from the fact that more than 50,000,000 of our population do not belong to the "reading class." The great majority of those who do belong to this class read nothing but the daily papers. Many boys and girls are leaving school at ages of fourteen to sixteen with no distinct taste for reading or ability to read understandingly. Within a few years an occasional newspaper and a little light fiction constitute the sum total of their reading. Now that the percentage of our school population who complete our elementary schools and our high schools is increasing rapidly, it becomes important that the school should guarantee to children, and particularly to those children coming from homes of non-reading parents, not only facility in reading but also a taste for reading material that is worth while and that will influence their reading habits for life.

Given the book that is not too difficult and that the child enjoys, how shall the teacher or parent know whether it is good for him? Terman and Lima, in their excellent book Children's Reading published by D. Appleton and Company, make the following statement regarding a desirable book for children:

> "The desirable book for children's reading should achieve one or more of the following aims: (1) It should inculcate worthy ideals of conduct and achievement which can actually motivate the child's life. It is necessary to make a sharp distinction here between the type of book which leads to dreams of impossible accomplishments and that which stimulates the formation of ideals that may be realized. (2) It should serve to cultivate an appreciation of the beautiful. (3) It should add to the child's fund of desirable knowledge. (4) It should arouse a desire for further reading of good literature."

The fairy story, the myth, the legend, and the story of adventure have their place in children's reading as well as the nature story, the book of travel, the biography, or other book of the informational type. No less important are various forms of fiction which inspire to high ideals and motivate right conduct. But the over-sentimental love story often presents false standards of life and exerts a harmful influence upon many an adolescent whose mental life could easily have been guided in more wholesome directions by a different choice of reading. Also the book of unreal adventure which fills the child's mind with fantastic exploits impossible of duplication in real life, such as super-human physical prowess or the luck of an over-night fortune, only leads the adolescent child to day dreaming that may result in disaster. Fortunately not all books of adventure fall into this class. That story of adventure and accomplishment which arouses activity and stimulates to normal undertakings has a real place in the literature of childhood.

There has been constant effort on the part of the compilers of this list of children's books to keep in mind the qualities found desirable in books and to present only such titles as would tend to "inculcate worthy ideals of conduct and achievement," or "cultivate an appreciation of the beautiful," or "add to the child's fund of desirable knowledge," or "arouse a desire for further reading of good literature." It will be strange if some titles of little merit have not crept into the list in spite of the care attending its preparation. It is hoped, however, that the list as a whole may prove of real assistance to teachers in their attempts to guide the reading habits of children, a work quite as important as the teaching of subject matter of textbooks.

HOW TO ORDER LIBRARY BOOKS

It is recommended that library books should be ordered through large distributing firms such as John W. Graham Co., Spokane; St. Paul Book and Stationery Co., St. Paul, Minn.; Brentano's, Chicago. Ordering in this way usually insures better transportation rates, though sometimes books may be secured more promptly direct from the publisher. Usually there is a discount from the list price for school libraries. The name of the author, title of book, and publisher should be given with all orders.

Districts desiring to order but a few books may frequently save considerable express or freight charges by leaving the order with the county superintendent to be combined with orders from other districts. Prices quoted are subject to change. They merely give some idea of the relative cost of books.

CARE OF BOOKS

Every book purchased for a school library should be neatly labeled as being the property of the school district. Most of the county superintendents are glad to furnish a printed gummed label for this purpose. Every teacher should have a record book and keep an accurate account of books loaned, to whom and when loaned, in order that none may be lost.

Children also should be instructed in the proper method of opening a new book and how to take proper care of all books. Unless teachers take time to train children not only in the proper care of books but also in ways of using books as sources of information the school library will not fully serve its intended purpose in the school.

Read Chapter 95 of the Montana School Law regarding the selection and care of library books.
